Bracken, the detective, and I

'I cannot say tune as a portrait painter. Then he was a handsome young man of five-and-twenty, with very taking manners oo and many accomplishments. He had no success as an artist, but he found the fortune he wanted in the posses-sion of a widow, and he married her, a woman much older than himself. No sooner was the knot tied than he began to make her money fly. In five years they hadn't a rap, * He was always a gentleman to his clderly wife. "About a year ago all was gone, except an insurance of a thousand pounds on his wife's life. They still lived over the road, but open house had been abandoned, horses and carriages put down, and the half-dozen servants reduced to none at all. The door remained unopened to callers, though now and then Prevot entertained a few intimate friends in his studio, wherehe gave them beer and birdseye instead of the champagne and Havanas of other days.

"Very little was now seen of Mrs.

Prevot. When her husband was asked about her, he shook his head and sighed, and said her health and spirits were so bad she could not find heart to meet anybody, or go out of the house even for the nir, and he was much afraid she would fail into deplorably bad health indeed. Then he told his friends he had insisted on Mrs. Prevot seeing a firstrate west end doctor, that she had been ordered abroad, was now in Paris with friends of his own, and that he' had begun to hope she was on the way to recovery. It was, he said, his intention to take up his residence in Paris as soon as he could settle their affairs in London. "A week later he declared the im-

"He went on Monday, the 16th of October, coming back on Friday, the noth, and driving up to his own door in a four-wheeler. Mrs. Prevot was a small, fragile woman at the hest and the hearts of the neighbors were saddened and softened to see the loving care and solicitude with which this spendthrift husband carried his sick wife into their old home to die. "Mrs. Prevot's condition was so bad that no one was allowed to see her, and in little over a week all the blinds of the house were down. One or two of her very little changed-something thinner and a good deal paler, that was all. This was the first day. The second day all who called were admitted to the death chamber. By this time the body had been placed in the coffin with a glass panel so that all might see the face. Prevot explained might see the face. Provot explained that the nature of the case made such an arrangement desirable. The funeral took place on the fifth day. Nothing noteworthy occurred at it.
